

CARB vs EPA

Choose the Correct Emissions Solution!

CARB (California Air Resources Board) catalytic converters are engineered to comply with California's rigorous emissions standards. These converters contain higher concentrations of precious metals, such as platinum, palladium and rhodium, to achieve superior emission reduction performance.

EPA (Environmental Protection Agency) catalytic converters are designed to meet federal emissions standards, which are less stringent than CARB. As a result, they generally contain fewer precious metals and have a simpler catalyst structure. While both types use similar materials, their effectiveness varies based on the specific regulatory requirements they are designed to meet.

Selling an EPA converter in CARB-compliant states is illegal and may result in fines. These states include California, Colorado, New York, and Maine, with Maine allowing EPA products only for pre-2001 vehicles model year.
